A poor example

When Admiral Stansfield Turner joined the Carter administration as head of the Central Intelligence Agency, he stated his opposition to double-dipping.

Turner remained on active duty and drew his Navy pay instead of a civilian's salary.

Now Turner is retiring from the Navy, and will draw a retirement income of about $23,000 in addition to a CIA salary of $57,500.

Certainly he's entitled to both, as are so many others who draw retirement pay from one government job while being paid a salary for another.

The point is, the Carter administration is supposed to be against double-dipping, and administration officials should be setting an example.

Some example the admiral turned out to be.
